One of the most saddening and humiliating exhibitions which human nature ever makes of itself, is in its greedy credulity touching all reports of the mistemeanors of good men. If a man stand high as a moral force in the community; if he stand as the rebuker and denouncer of social and political sin; if he be looked up to by any bonsiderable number of people as an example of virtue; if the whole power of his life be in a high and pare direction; it his personality and influence render any allegation against his character most improbable, then most readily does any such allegation find eager believers. It maiters not from what source the slander may come. Multitudes will be influenced by a report against a good man's character from one who would not be believed under oath in any matter involving the pecuniary interest of fifty cents. Thessalanders may be a banneless sincer against social virtue—may be a notorious liar, a libertine, a drunkard, or a harlot—all this matters nothing. The engine that throws the mut is not regarded.
